

“Young man,” he said, harshly, “there’s a few things you can’t buy; you may think you can buy ‘em—you may pay for ‘em, too—but they can’t be bought an’ sold. You thought you bought Grier’s tract; you thought you bought a lot o’ deer an’ birds an’ fish, several thousand acres in timber, and a dozen lakes. An’ you paid for ‘em, too. But, sonny, you was took in; you paid for ‘em, but you didn’t buy ‘em, because Grier couldn’t sell God’s free critters. He fooled ye that time.” “Is that the way you regard it, Santry?” asked Burleson. “Is that the way these people regard private property?” “I guess it is,” replied the ragged man, resuming his seat on the flour-barrel. “I cal’late the Lord Almighty fashioned His wild critters f’r to peramble round about, offerin’ a fair mark an’ no favor to them that’s smart enough to git ‘em with buck, bird-shot, or bullet. Live wild critters ain’t for sale; they never was made to buy an’ sell. The spryest gits ‘em—that’s all about it, I guess, Mister Burleson.” A hard-faced young man leaning against the counter, added significantly: “We talked some to Grier, an’ he sold out. He come here, too, just like you.” The covert menace set two spots of color deepening in young Burleson’s lean cheeks; but he answered calmly: “What a man believes to be his own he seldom abandons from fear of threats.” “That’s kinder like our case,” observed old man Santry, chewing vigorously. Another man leaned over and whispered to a neighbor, who turned a grim eye on Burleson without replying. As for Burleson and his argument, a vicious circle had been completed, and there was little chance of an understanding; he saw that plainly, but, loath to admit it, turned towards old man Santry once more. “If what has been common rumor is true,” he said, “Mr. Grier, from whom I bought the Spirit Lake tract, was rough in defending what he believed to be his own. I want to be decent; I desire to preserve the game and the timber, but not at the expense of human suffering. You know better than I do what has been the history of Fox Cross-roads. Twenty-five years ago your village was a large one; you had tanneries, lumber-mills, paper-mills—even a newspaper. To-day the timber is gone, and so has the town except for your homes—twenty houses, perhaps. Your soil is sand and slate, fit only for a new forest; the entire country is useless for farming, and it is the natural home of pine and oak, of the deer and partridge.”
